COMCAST FOUNDATION AWARDS $50,000 GRANT TO THE HIGHLANDS SCHOOL

Funds Slated to Help Equip School's Community Outreach Center for Literacy

Bel Air, Md. – The Comcast Foundation has awarded a $50,000 grant to The Highlands School. The funds, awarded in two yearly installments of $25,000 each, are earmarked to help the school grow and expand its Community Outreach Center for Literacy and related programs.

The Community Outreach Center for Literacy is part of the newly-opened, state-of-the-art school located in Bel Air, Md., which serves children in Kindergarten through eighth grade with learning differences including Dyslexia, Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD), language and auditory processing deficits and other learning needs. The center affords families and educators access to the latest research and resources on learning differences, offering the local public a variety of tools and materials intended to facilitate a better understanding of learning differences, how to recognize them and how to overcome them.

Comcast's donation will be used to purchase additional resources and literature and to fund educational programs and events offered by the Community Outreach Center. The donation will also aid the center in establishing tutoring programs and professional development opportunities for teachers. Comcast will provide its High Speed Internet and Digital Cable services for use in the Community Outreach Center.

"Through Comcast's generous donation, we will be able to further expand our community outreach programs to ensure that our students, their families, our faculty and the broader public better understand the learning differences that exist and how we can work together to provide children who learn differently with the opportunities for achievement that they deserve," said Patricia A. Bonney, executive director of The Highlands School.

"Comcast is proud to support The Highlands School and the programs it is offering students and families in our area," said Brian Lynch, area vice president for Comcast. "As a company dedicated to our local communities, Comcast is consistently seeking to partner with organizations that have such a profound impact on our youth and their future stability and success."
